Underpricing Bordered Carpets.

—We can sometimes go as low as half price in the selling of these Bordered Carpets—and always a third under what the same grades and patterns would cost made up from the roll.
—Another new lot of these carpets ready now. We believe it's the choicest we've shown so far. The big carpet selling of August and September made lots of remnants to be utilized in this way.

A Unique Collection From the Philippines.

In our east window we are displaying a collection from the Philippines made by Captain Ahern. It illustrates the arts of peace and warfare in those far-off possessions. The woods shown in this collection show a particularly valuable resource of the country. The quaint hats and mats, products of the Philippine weaver, are perfect specimens of exact, care-taking work. Unique swords, spears, daggers of various kinds are shown, interspersed with an ancient coat of mail and guns and muskets that cause a natural inquiry of "how are they fired?" The results of firing from some of them must be equally as dangerous for the "man behind the gun" as the one in front of it. The art of painting is illustrated by plaques with raised and colored figures, showing different phases of life in those islands. Altogether the collection is interesting and valuable, and well worth a visit to see.

His Little Game.
From Tit-Bits.
An Irishman took a contract to dig a public well. When he had dug about twenty-five feet down he came one morning and found it caved in—filled nearly to the top. Pat looked cautiously round and saw that no one was near; then took off his hat and coat and hung them on the windlass, crawled into some bushes and waited events.

In a short time the citizens discovered that the well had caved in, and seeing Pat's hat and coat on the windlass they supposed he was at the bottom of the excavation.

Only a few hours of brisk digging cleared the loose earth from the well. Just as the eager citizens had reached the bottom, and were wondering where the body was, Pat came walking out of the bushes and good-naturedly thanked them for relieving him of a sorry job.

Some of the tired diggers were disgusted, but the joke was too good to allow of anything more than a hearty laugh, which soon followed.

THE LUMBER INDUSTRY.

An Object Lesson on the Treatment of Southern Forests.

For several years George W. Vanderbilt, on his estates at Baltimore, N. C., has been giving to the south, and to the rest of the country a magnificent object lesson of the value of scientific handling of forests. Such an object lesson has been greatly needed. Much of the advance made by the south as a producer of lumber has been due to the failure in other parts of the country to adopt plain, common sense methods in lumbering operations.

Large tracts of timber land have been denuded by the wholesale, with a great waste of cut timber, destruction of younger growth and an absolute disregard of the future. With the transfer of energies to the south and an acceleration of those already there, like carelessness and lack of foresight have been manifested.

The efforts of the forestry division of the United States Department of Agriculture, culminating in the plan for a vast forest reservation at the summits of the Appalachian in five or six northern states, and the work of such progressive men as Mr. Vanderbilt, have done much to fasten attention upon the necessity for a conservative handling of the forests still standing in the south, and a restoration of woodland in regions devoted wholly to agriculture or left to waste after the logging work is done and lumbermen have wrought their work.

One state in the south which has come to the front as lumber producer seems destined to become the leader in the reforestation of common sense and science to lumbering undertakings. In connection with the organization of the $20,000,000 Houston Oil Company, in Texas, the statement was made that it had entered into a contract with the Kirby Lumber Company, organized at the same time, for the sale and manufacture of the timber standing on the 1,000,000 acres of its oil lands.

This contract involves the cutting of 1,000,000 feet of timber, at the rate of not less than $50,000,000 a year. If the minimum only shall be cut nearly twenty-three years will cover the contract. Under ordinary conditions it might be expected that the close of those twenty-three years would show a vast tract of waste land at the mercy of the elements. But the contract between the oil company and the lumber company contemplates no such thing. It looks to the exploitation of the forest and, at the same time, to its preservation. It is a conservation of the forest and the land on which it grows. It is a conservation of the future.

No tree less than one foot in diameter is to be cut, and care is to be had that sawing and other young growth are to be uninjured. The results of this undertaking may be easily estimated for the particular tract. They mean a source of steady wealth. They mean a duplication in other parts of the south.

In spite of the decrease of pine in the south, the country there are large amounts of virgin timber of this kind in several states toward which the saw-mill and the lumber railroad are advancing. Increasing demand for such timber requires a permanent clearing of some of the uncut forests, but there are vast tracts of best southern forest growth, not only in the south, but in the north, which are the flow of streams important to commerce and manufactures and as equable moderators of climate.

The use of such industrial centers as High Point, N. C., with wood-working interests, especially furniture making, as their foundation, and the necessity for a steady supply from the sawmill. For many reasons, therefore, the success of the Texas experiment should lead to similar action in other parts of the south.

REMEDY FOR THE BLUES.
It is So Very Simple That Any One Can Test It.

From the Minneapolis Tribune.
"A well-known doctor of Minneapolis, who has made a specialty of nervous diseases, has found a new remedy for 'the blues.' As no drugs are administered, he has felt safe in experimenting with at least half a hundred melancholy patients, and now declares himself thoroughly satisfied with the good results of his treatment. His prescription reads something like this: 'If you keep the corners of your mouth turned up you can't feel blue.' The directions for taking are: 'Smile—keep on smiling—don't stop smiling.' It sounds ridiculous, doesn't it? Well, just try turning up the corners of your mouth, and you will be willing to declare 'there's something in it.'"

"The doctor treats his nervous patients to medicine when necessary, but when the case is one of pure melancholy without bodily ailment, he simply recommends the smile cure. He has the patient remain in his office and smile; if it isn't the genuine article, it must be a forced smile. He keeps the corners of the mouth and the better feelings follow inevitably. The treatments are followed up regularly, and the patients are told to keep the smile up. It takes considerable persuasion to induce some of them to apply the cure, and of course, the greater number of patients are women, for when a man is blue he is bound to be blue in spite of everything, but a woman is more easily persuaded to try to find a cure.

"The doctor declares that if persons who only draw down the corners of their mouths and are sufficient to power they can actually, shed tears. On the other hand, if they will persistently keep the corners of the mouth turned up, pleasant thoughts will chase away the gloomy forebodings. His discovery grew out of the fact that a woman came to him in a despondent mood he would ask her to smile. A little while and the saying came to be a household joke. But it brought about good results, and then came the inspiration to try the same cure on others.

"The doctor has not patented his remedy, and it is free to all who choose to take advantage of it."

DUTCHMEN IN STONE.

Uses Made of the Term by Architects and Policemen.

The presence of several "Dutchmen" on the custom house building, near the roof, attracted the other day the attention of a small but interested group of observers.

I was passing at the time and overheard one man say to another, pointing at the same time with his finger: "There they are, right above that cornice." I was not particularly curious, but a few feet further on I inquired of a boy who had just come from the scene as to the nature of the trouble, if there was any, and he told me that one of the men had said that there were a couple of Dutchmen up there.

I retraced my steps, and looked up intently for the gentlemen from Holland, but couldn't see anything on or near the roof, and, as the men were just gazing at the building, I ventured to ask about any person being seen on the edifice. The man whom I addressed I found to be a well-known architect, and he replied that he was merely pointing out to a visiting member of the craft several "Dutchmen" in some of the larger blocks of marble. "You see," he said, "when a contractor receives a large piece of marble containing a flaw, he hates to sacrifice the whole piece on that account, and so he deftly inserts a plug in the place of the flaw, and the plug, when it is properly smoothed over no one but an expert can tell it. In time, however, the lines of the 'Dutchman,' as it is called, can easily be seen, just as you can see those two up there," he said, pointing to the spot. I certainly felt enlightened.

By this time the policemen sometimes use another kind of "Dutchman." When at night they discover the door of a building not locked, they nail a little piece of wood on the back of the door, a foot or so from the floor, and another piece on the floor, say an equal distance from the bottom of the door. Then a board is obtained, one end of which is placed against the door, the board has been made on the floor, while the other end rests loosely against the back of the door, and everything is ready for the policeman to push the door to, and the board slips under the door, and the place is so securely locked that when the occupant comes in the morning he must either break in the door or get a ladder and enter in that way. So much for the handy uses of Dutchmen, and there may be others.

Why He Kept Silence.
From London Answers.
At an evening party a gentleman related an adventure in which he had been the principal actor, and seeing unmistakable shadows of doubt on the faces of his hearers, he appealed to a friend who was present and who had witnessed the circumstances, so to corroborate his statement.

To his utter confusion, his friend denied all knowledge of the affair.

Meeting some time afterward, the suspicious gentleman asked the friend: "Is it possible that you can have forgotten the circumstance to which I referred at Mrs. A's party the other night?"

"Certainly not," the friend replied, "but I could see that every one present looked upon you as an incorrigible liar, and I had too much regard for my character to risk being taken for another."
